Aerophones are one of the instrument families with the most variety. Among them we can find a great diversity, both in external forms and in their construction systems. Flutes, whistles, ocarinas and Lloronas.

The anthropomorphic flute called "Whistling Glass", is equipped with a container to contain the water that activates the sound. When filling the aforementioned rear tank and gently tilting it forward, the water displaces the air contained in the body of the instrument, which represents a human head, and causes the action of the whistle that is incorporated into the headdress of the figure. the small slits in the eyes, while emitting a sound from the whistle, with the push of the water, it can drip as if crying ". For this reason, this flute is also known as "Llorona".
